Thursday, February 01, 2018 05:00:06 AM (GMT)

- The WSJ reports that at a meeting 31-Jan, state gambling commissioners raised concerns about sexual harassment allegations against Steve Wynn, and if they conclude that he's not a "suitable" casino operator, they have the ability to revoke the company's license.
- The WSJ reports that a commission official said that the allegations weren't made available to the commission before the 26-Jan publication of the WSJ article; a Wynn resorts spokesman says that the application process didn't seek the disclosure of such information.
- The article says that the commission official said that a review would include Steve Wynn, the company, and other people in the licensing review, and she didn't know how long the review might take.
- The WSJ reports that commission chairman Stephen Crosby said that the commission would pay close attention to how the Wynn Resorts board handles the situation.
- StreetAccount notes that the information in the article seems to have largely come from a press conference.
