

Wynn Resorts executives served as enablers for Steve Wynn's sexual misconduct - WSJ
Wednesday, March 28, 2018 03:11:50 AM (GMT)

- In a front-page story, dozens of former employees tell the WSJ that managers and supervisors frequently dismissed or ignored complaints about Steve Wynn's behavior and sometimes told employees to find damaging information about people who were complaining in order to justify firing them. The interviewees tell the WSJ that the company's written policy against sexual harassment didn't strictly apply to Steve Wynn.
- One employee tells the WSJ she remembered feeling "zero support" after Steve Wynn initiated an unspecified sexual act on her.
- The WSJ reports that the employees' tales cover decades, varying jobs, and different properties in Steve Wynn's empire.
- An attorney for Steve Wynn tells the WSJ that his client declines to comment, "because it is clear that the Journal has no intention of treating him fairly" with respect to the "salacious" allegations.
- A Wynn Resorts board committee investigating Steve Wynn's behavior tells the WSJ that commenting would be inappropriate until its investigation is complete; CEO Matt Maddox tells the WSJ that the company intends to act quickly on any recommendations from the investigation.

Reference Links:

- Wall Street Journal
- Lawyer's statement on behalf of Steve Wynn

Industries: Casinos & Gaming

Primary Identifiers: 1128-HK, WYNN-US

Related Identifiers: 1128-HK, WYNN-US

Subjects: Articles, Reports, Conjecture, Media Summaries, Published Reports