

Federal government looking into 21st Century Fox's sexual-harassment disclosures - WSJ
Thursday, February 16, 2017 03:00:42 AM (GMT)

- People familiar with the matter tell the WSJ that the company may not have sufficiently informed investors about claims against former Fox News chairman/CEO Roger Ailes.
- The sources tell the WSJ that the government is thought to be looking at settlements from before former Fox News anchor Gretchen Carlson's lawsuit last summer.
- One of the sources tells the WSJ that an internal Fox probe in 2016 apparently found that Fox News had a fund to pay people who claimed sexual harassment, but the fund's name didn't accurately reflect its purpose.
- A person familiar with the matter tells the WSJ that prosecutors are probably trying to figure out whether the company's nomenclature constituted fraud.
- The WSJ reports that Fox News says neither it nor 21st Century Fox has been subpoenaed.
