Along with notable influencers, Macy's own colleagues are celebrating the significance of this historic month as they reflect on the Black experience in America. Abigail James, GVP, Marketing Strategy at Macy's, commented, "Black History is all around us, and impacts our lives daily. Having a recognized time to celebrate accomplishments, perseverance, family and traditions is an opportunity to appreciate, teach and expose others to the rich history of African Americans in the building of this country."

Diversity and inclusion is a Macy's core value, essential to the brand's success and one that brings colleagues together as a united front. "Macy's is extremely excited to host a series of Black History Month events at our stores nationwide that reflect on the Black experience and its extraordinary impact on our culture," said Kristyn Doar-Page, Macy's vice president of Diversity & Inclusion Strategies. "From art and music to food and the empowering role of the Historically Black Colleges and Universities in shaping generations of leaders, continuing the conversation of Black legacies and achievements is an honor that Macy's takes pride in each and every year."

Iconic costume designer of the film "Black Panther," Ruth E. Carter, will make an appearance at Macy's Baldwin Hills in Los Angeles for an afternoon of insightful dialogue. Carter will share her experiences working in the industry and how Black history is an integral part in fashion and film. Grammy Award® winner and artist Fantastic Negrito will join Macy's in celebration of Black History Month with a special performance and conversation at Macy's Union Square in San Francisco. In New York City at Macy's Herald Square, customers will have the chance to celebrate 100 years of the Harlem Renaissance as we celebrate the music, style and food of Harlem's past, present, and future with fashion mogul Dapper Dan. A Chicago native, Sir uses the power of hip hop's influence to tell compelling stories about real people through his music. At Macy's Lakeside in New Orleans, Macy's Lenox in Atlanta, and Macy's Aventura in Miami, representatives from Florida A&M University, Clark Atlanta University, Dillard University, and Xavier University will participate in discussions regarding Black History Month and the impact that these higher education institutions are bringing to their local communities.
