- The NYT reports that a Massachusetts Gaming Commission report found that high-ranking executives helped hide sexual misconduct allegations against Wynn despite a zero-tolerance company rule on sexual harassment.
- The article says that the regulator found that the executives failed to initiate an investigation or report the allegations to the company's board or its audit and compliance committees, choosing instead to participate in "affirmative efforts to conceal allegations against Mr. Wynn that came to their attention."
- The article says that the report observes that gambling licensees are expected to report potential violations of industry rules.
- The NYT reports that the report was released as the regulator started its three-day hearing on whether to permit the company to start operating a Boston-area resort in June.
